Although Feathered Pipe is settled in the Rocky Mountains of Montana, classes don't take place in barns with yogis sporting cowboy hats. Feathered Pipe actually is one of the best yoga retreats in the country.

Feathered Pipe Foundation, Montana

If you're expecting cowgirl yoga because this is Montana, forget about it. Instead, you'll find Iyengar, Hatha, and energy medicine therapies including Reiki and Chakra healing. Located deep in the Rocky Mountains near Helena, Feathered Pipe has been a destination for both healing and learning since it was established in 1975 as the Holistic Health Foundation. That year, in partnership with the California Yoga Teachers Association, the Foundation began publishing Yoga Journal (now published by John B. Abbott in Berkeley, California).

Feathered Pipe Foundation also arranges international workshops, retreats, and study tours where participants can experience—and learn from—ancient tribal traditions. Feathered Pipe has a sister property, the Blacktail Ranch, in Wolf Creek, Montana. The grounds of Blacktail contain a number of archaeological sites, caves from the Ice Age, and several Native American ceremonial sites.

REVIVE A variety of traditional massage and bodywork treatments, available from area therapists, may be scheduled when making reservations or during your stay. Plus, you have a choice of sleeping accommodations: tipi, yurt, tent, or dorm.

REFUEL The menu features organic foods whenever possible. Most dishes have a vegetarian slant, but chicken and fish are also available. Special dietary needs can also be met.

DO Ride, raft, fish, hike, birdwatch, take a workshop, or enjoy a session of astrology, shamanism, cooking, art, or holistic health.
